The objective of this study is to analyse the community's changes that lead to propose the development guidelines for the part of Bangkok by using Wat Kanlaya Subdistrict, Thonburi District as a case study. The study explored both of the social aspect and the physical aspect of community's structure, and recommendation for the future development according to the concept of community conservation.

The study found that the six ancient communities and six new communities have separated to four groups; conservative community, decayed community, adjustable community and new community ; and indicated each community's potential, constraint, opportunity including with the orientation of the community's alteration.

By the means of the directly touch of communities by observation and participation, the study has got closer with the exact life of these communities. Based on the social network analysis and created the social network analysis on site (SNAS), the study divided into four parts of the new analysis's approach; part one) the study of social interaction and common tied, part two) the study of social interaction related to the site function, part three) the forecasting of the social network's alteration and part four) the forecasting of the community's changes and the future function of Wat Kanlaya Subdistrict.

The conclusion and suggestion of the study have synthesised the development guidelines into two plans; the community's plan - the social development guidelines and the spatial plan stressed on the physical development . Futhmore, the spatial plan has proposed two concepts of implementation; buffer zone concept and the concept of multipurposed area.
