The objective of this study is to study the movement of the SET index (the Stock Exchange of Thailand index) as a political stability indicator and political feedbacker. The movement of the SET index was affected by many factors. The domestic political situation was one of these factors.

From this study (1975 - the middle of 1995), it is found that in the beginning period, the SET index was not actually affected by the domestic political situations. Most of important factors in the period were economic one. Until the middle of 1988, the impact of the domestic political factor has increased significantly as a major factor, especially in 1991 - 1992 as a result of the 1991 coup and the 1992, May incident.
