This study aims at scrutinizing the formation of associational groups in Thailand. Its objectives are to analyze the theory of formation of associational groups as the beneficiary groups and to study their status quo and roles. Assumptions set for the study are whether the main objectives of the groups are deviated from the original, whether the officials has negative attitudes towards the beneficiary groups, how the legislation for the formation of associational groups restrict their development and whether the beneficiary groups have limited group performances.

From the study the formation of beneficiary groups or associations can be classified into the following : (1) groups or associations who promote economical and managerial development for the country, and (2) groups or associations who create obstacles and problems to economical and managerial development of the country.

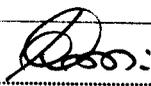

Basically when the groups pursue their group process, their main objectives are diverse from the beginning and inter alia they mostly do not follow the laws and rules. Elements which causes the diversion of objectives are such as number of personnel, resources, and concerned government officials. Exploitation of the group especially the second group is more than of the first group. Under the circumstances, they conclusively affect the variety difficulty, in the formation of associational groups, and accordingly affect the management and administration in democracy.

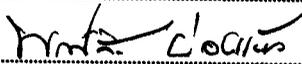

Under democratic regime, the government thus should promote the formation of associational groups in order to acknowledge the public requirement, and adjust the government policies towards them to be accepted by the public. Addition to this, the government should promote the development of other groups to a certain extent to become political parties as happened in other developed countries.
