This study focuses on conflicts during the process of decentralization policy making, which affected the stability of Chuan Leekpai's government.

The research finding are that conflicts in the process of policy making on decentralization occurred during the policy formulation stage. This was because decentralization can be carried out by various methods and at various levels. Differences between coalition government parties were unearthed at this stage especially when each of the parties tried to manipulate the policy process so as to gain support for itself. These eventuated in conflicts,

Such conflicts, and differences in the policy and cleavages between coalition government parties and their members, made for instability for the Chuan's government.
