This thesis aims at illustrating some implications of the Single European Market on Thai frozen fishery industries.

The findings of this thesis are as follow: 1) EU Directives relating to consumer protection, technical and veterinary area will effect the export of Thai frozen fishery products. 2) With regard to the Thai frozen fishery producers, improvements within the processing plants are needed to response the requirements of EU Directives such as plant sanitations, temperature control in the storage rooms etc. 3) As competent authority, testing and certification will be delivered to whom which processing plants comply with EU Directives. For this reason, aquaculture animal farms and auction markets will be more strickly controlled by the competent authority. 4) Thai legislation should be adopted in the area of drug residues in animal products. Similarly, some measures should be taken and reformed to promote the export of Thai frozen fishery products.
