

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

The decision of conducting thesis on Japan's security issue started during my part-time job as a research assistant. The nuclear crises on the Korean Peninsula was one of the interesting topics that my adviser, Associate Professor Dr. Siriporn Wajjwalku, suggested to me. I was grateful for her attention, support, and encouragement from the beginning of my work. I daresay--she was a good instructor and an excellent academic of Thailand.

The other two committees, Assistant Professor Dr. Kittti Prasertsuk and Assistant Professor Dr. Pisanu Suntraluk, provided the helpful suggestions and comments for the development of my proposal and full report. Particularly, Dr. Kittti lent me the useful books for the better understanding on Japan's role and policies towards North Korea's nuclear crises. Accordingly, I really appreciated all their kindness.

The thesis would not complete unless the following people gave me a hand with their cooperation: the anonymous scholars from Thammasat and Chulalongkorn University and the high-ranking officer from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Thailand. Thanks also go to all of the officers from the MIR (Master of International Relations) Program, Faculty of Political Science, Thammasat University. Thank you Mr. Micheal for your grammatical check.

In addition, I would like to thank all those who always encouraged me all along the study. We always shared idea, information, knowledge, and good and bad experiences. Thank you my colleagues: Oranuch, Rungnapa, Lakana, and Panupan. Moreover, Jiraporn, Prapawan, Wanida, Kaissuda, Rawadee, Rachanok, and Rungrawee often urged me to continue doing the thesis and warmly provided encouragement whenever I felt discouraged. Thank you.

I owe the special thanks to my family and relatives who always give me support, love, care, encouragement, and understanding. I hope they can feel what I want to say—Thank you.
