Abstract

The study aims to find out the opinions on commodity management as practised against the requirement and expectation of commodity staff and administrators of King Mongkut's Institute of Technology North Bangkok and Rungsit University. The study groups comprise administrators and commodity staff of both universities. The groups are selected using multistage random sampling.

The questionnaire is divided into three parts to be answered by commodity staff and administrators of office/faculty/college of both universities.

SPSS/PC+ statistical package is used to analyse the data to find standard deviation and the t-test of the two sampling groups.

The result shows that commodity management as practised against the requirement and expectation of commodity staff and administrators of King Mongkut's Institute of Technology North Bangkok and Rungsit University are not significantly different at the 0.05 statistical level.
